The first time my manager decided that I was therefore 'broken', sent me to occupational health to be 'fixed', ostracised me from the team, refused to give me work and eventually eased me out of my job. The second time, my manager was hugely empathetic, supportive and told me to 'look after myself first' and has been constantly in conversation with me about how best the organisation can 'use my talents and experience without compromising my health'. 1	My supervisor asked me too much about MS, bringing it up again and again. To much emphasis under the guise of being caring.	6/9/2020 7:52 PM
2	I am self employed at the moment. Ten years ago I was employed full time and at the time of diagnosis when I had regular clinical appointments the director of the organisation I worked for displayed his impatience and annoyance openly and gave me no empathy. I was also pregnant with my first child at that time.	5/29/2020 12:42 AM

12	Nu a fost cazul	4/22/2020 6:55 PM
13	HR has a hard time dealing with my illness - and provide little flexibility in management. "I am unreliable because of my health" has been said among other things. There is little understanding nor help from this part of the organisation. My direct supervisor is overwhelmed and avoids direct communication. They see me more as a problem than an asset.	4/15/2020 12:42 PM

15	N/A	3/17/2020 5:30 PM
16	Lack of understanding. They gave me too much work.	3/16/2020 5:54 PM
17	My first manager, as above, thought I was malingering. Because MS doesn't have an outward 'show', she assumed I was being difficult, stupid and incapable of work. She actually said to me in a 'development review' that "You need to think about whether you are going to be capable of working in the future. After all, your brain is not good - but your body looks healthy; have you thought of manual work?". She showed no kind of understanding of how I was already doing my best to 'keep up', working significantly longer hours to stay on top of my workload, nor of how this was already impacting my physical and mental health. She simply assumed that because I was 'someone with a chronic condition' that I was going to be of no use to her, couldn't be 'trusted with work, as no one will ever know if you are capable of delivery or not', shut me out of meetings and projects where my experience would have been ideal and eventually made me redundant.	3/16/2020 2:56 PM
